Mergers and Acquisitions (M&A) Training Course

Introduction

Introduction

For individual managers and employees, a merger or acquisition is not just a corporate or business strategy; it's a personally disruptive—often traumatic—experience. What C-suite executives and consultants indirectly call "post-merger integration" is normally a period of tension, uncertainty, and even chaos.

Workloads ramp up, as do pressure, difficulty, and stress. You might have to swiftly adapt to unfamiliar policies, practices, and politics; work with strangers from different corporate or even national cultures, or report to new bosses who know nothing about your track record or ambitions.

Meanwhile, there is no guarantee of a job with the ensuing and resulting organization, let alone a long-term career. On average, approximately 30% of employees are deemed redundant after a merger or acquisition in the same industry.

In such circumstances, most individuals tend to fixate on what they can't control: decisions about who is let go, promoted, reassigned, or transferred. But in our findings and consulting practices, we've found that individuals faced with organizational disruption have much more power over what happens to them than they realize.

If your organization is involved in one of the tens of thousands of M&A deals struck annually around the world, you can respond in a few ways. The first option is to keep your head down, pay attention to the tasks at hand, and hope that everything turns out OK.

A second approach is to refine your résumé, reconnect to your outside peer network, and start looking for alternative employment. But we recommend a third and possibly more constructive choice: Embrace the dynamic, intense integration process and use it as an opportunity for introspection and growth.

We've met and worked with hundreds of professionals who've taken this methodology and say that as an outcome, their M&A experiences were exhilarating—maybe even "the best thing that ever happened" to them.

Not all individuals were able to form every decision in their favour or get their desired jobs; indeed, some had to retool themselves to succeed at their new organizations, and a few were ultimately required to move on to different employers. Nevertheless, almost all felt that they emerged from the process as "winners," empowered with greater self-knowledge, heightened visibility, and new skills.

This Xcelerate Training Institute course will empower you with the skills to develop, implement, and maintain a comprehensive Mergers and Acquisitions Strategy for your organization.
